

A New Year's Message, 2018:

Church! Let's start with prayer, this morning!

Prayer:

Introduction:

It's a weird time right now, you know? Not yet the New Year, but, as far as we celebrate it, no longer really "Christmastime." Some of us have gone back to work, or will tomorrow, even as many students are still out of school.

But I wanted to offer what I guess has become a personal tradition, at least, which is to take the admittedly artificial opportunity a "New Year" is, to help us think about "newness" a little bit.

Because I'd guess, if we took a poll, that we all need something. We all want something, even after or maybe on account of something we discovered, over Christmas. And a New Year gives us an opportunity to think about the way what we want, or what we believe we need, relates to living well for God. Because we're meant to be new things ourselves.

Making All Things New:

There's a moment, at the end of John's Revelation, where God declares, "I am making all things new!" It's at the end of John's vision, and follows a description of the world as it will be, set completely right, a vision of "a new heaven and a new earth," and it draws on dozens of promises from Isaiah about the way God would finally come through for his people, would remake the world as they knew it, destroy death, bring peace, and take care of every need his people had. John, in Revelation, reminds us that this is still coming, that it's centered around Jesus and what Jesus has done, and that this--oh, act of making things new--is not only on its way, but it's already started--we're in the middle of it, taking part in it as we keep faith with Jesus.

This is a lot like what Paul says in 2 Corinthians:

“If anyone is in Christ--New Creation! Everything old has passed away. Behold! Everything has become new.”

He goes on to say that this is all because of God, who reconciled himself to us--restored our relationship with him. Right before this, Paul says

“...the love of Christ urges us on, because we are convinced that one has died for all; therefore all have died. And he died for all, so that those who live might no longer live for themselves, but for him who died and was raised for them.”

Jesus' death and resurrection has caused a shift, for Paul, in what it means for people to really live, to exist at all. We're not supposed to evaluate people from a this-world-only perspective, but to see all people in light of what the Messiah has done, and in particular, to realize that what's true of Jesus can be said to be already true of those of us who trust him, exactly and entirely because God is so faithful and always come through for us: Jesus died, we've died--at least to our pre-Jesus way of life--Jesus has been resurrected--we will be too, and we should live our lives like he lived, “put on the Lord Jesus Christ” as he says in Romans.

Paul’s greater point is that something new has happened in Jesus, and that what happened in Jesus, to Jesus, has already begun to happen in us and is so certain that we can count on it being made permanent.

We bear witness to what the life of new heaven and earth will be like, because we’re able to live like Jesus lived, trust God like Jesus trusted God. When people look at us, they see what “New Creation” looks like.

Or: they could, they should. We wish they would.

Living Up to What We Are:

When Paul says “Everything old has passed away: Look! Everything has become new” it should be a reminder to us to ask ourselves how well we’re doing living up to who we really are.

Because who we really are are people who “live no longer for ourselves, but for him who died and was raised for us,” people who are part of the “new creation,” even as we live in this one that’s passing away.

Are we putting on Christ? Dressing up in his clothes, walking in his shoes, embodying him and becoming more like him all the time? What I always want for us is that we simply live up to who we are.

You know what I mean, by this, right? We've talked about it in the past, I'm sure. Most of us are told--or we pick up along the way--some ideal of who we're meant to be. "That's not what Hagopians do!" Or "How Whitesides act." Or "The Bocanegra Way." We hear, or learn, along the way, that we're meant to live up to something.

Or we're given nicknames: You're a cowboy. You're a princess. You're a brat. Some part of us is elevated up above the rest, and we latch onto it, and it directs who we try to be in the world: "You're so athletic, you're so smart, you're so good with your siblings, you're so nice to strangers."

But at some point we realize that whether or not we're athletic, or smart, or responsible, or compassionate, what we have to be before we act out these roles that others around us have encouraged us in, what we must be, is Christian. We have to first be Christian, centered on Christ, and let all the other standards that have been draped over our shoulders be second.

We live up to the new creation life God has given to us, not down to the roles we've been encouraged in, or the labels we've been given, no matter how much praise we've received for them.

Tacking Things On:

And we can tack things onto this. Maybe we should.

I want to be a faithful Christian who in 2019 stops drinking so many calories or eats less junk. I want to live up to my New Creation identity who, in 2019, reads more non-fiction books. Plays more with my kid. Moves now and then. Doesn't tell jokes that aren't kind. Spends less time on Pinterest. Whatever.

But to be someone who is more like Christ: that's something that should be a part of what we desire for this coming year.

Christian Resolutions?

Living in this old-creation world as new-creation people takes effort; every faithful thing takes effort. We aren't going to accidentally or by magic, choose to direct our energies and efforts at life toward Jesus instead of toward whatever is marketing at us. If we wait for an accident, we may as well give up. It is worth our while to consider how, this coming year, we are going to intentionally try to become more like Jesus.

And in case we're out of ideas, I want to offer us just a tiny handful. We could call these, oh, "Christian Resolutions," I guess.

Read more Scripture:

For any of us who were taught to live up to some standard, some ideal, whether it's a nickname we were given, the expectations laid on us as children, or whatever, if we're really supposed to be people who live up to Jesus' example, live his life as our own, we have a responsibility to actually figure out what his example is.

Just what does it mean to become like Jesus? You can't depend only on what I say, or what the Church says, or what media, Christian or otherwise, says--even if here and there in those places it's good, true information. We have got to go to Scripture. We've got to discover, in Christ as Scripture presents him, the standard for our name, "Christian," that we are meant to live up to.

If we don't read Scripture, don't open our Bibles and read about Jesus, it's going to be really hard to figure out what it is we're supposed to be as New Creation people.

So: Are any of us going to read more scripture in 2019? Reflect more on what we see when we open the Bible? Is this a resolution we would be willing to make?

Or will our standard be Jesus as someone else tells us about him? Will our standard be something else entirely? A brother our parents never thought we were as good as, a character we always admired in a movie? Someone less than Jesus, no matter how good they might have been for us.

Befriend our Neighbors:

And there's something really true in saying that we present what it means to be a Christian falsely if we simply aren't engaging with people in neighborly ways. We lie about Jesus. Jesus calls us to Love God and love Neighbor, and teaches us that by thoughtfully providing for other people's needs and offering them caring attention, we turn strangers into our neighbors. Proximity has nothing to do with this; intentional effort has everything.

And of course I'm not going to prescribe what it might look like in practice to "love our neighbors as ourselves" or to be like the Good Samaritan when we go from here to there, but we could ask ourselves questions that would force us to evaluate how well we're doing in this Christian area.

When was the last time in 2018 we helped personally care for a stranger--not by the very good and important proxies of money or groups we support--but by our own hands? When in 2018 did we last have a chat with someone who lives near us about anything at all?

Or there's the good old, "What would our neighbors say about us?" If the only reputation we have in the world is that we're hard to get to know, 2019 may be a year we could work on that. For those of us who have moved recently, what will our neighbors say about us in a year? For those of us who have had people move in nearby—on our streets, down the hall at work—what will they say?

Are any of us willing to work to befriend some people this year? To become a person who is known as friendly, neighborly, caring, helpful, and loving--and a Christian? If we would all resolve to do this, man: it'd be nice to know us, you know, because in knowing us people would meet the Lord.

Catalogue our Prayers:

Maybe this year we could catalogue our prayers, catalogue our prayers. We could write down what we've intentionally prayed for and when, in some simple way, and with it, we'd realize some things:

First, we'd be able to realize just how little or how much we're intentionally praying. We may be able to see patterns in our prayers--are we always praying for one family in particular, or one place in particular, and why? What are we neglecting.

Secondly, we'd be able to remember the ways God answers prayer. God has been so good to so many people we care about, and to us too. Cataloguing our prayers and their answers nurtures us in prayer.

Mostly, though, I think that cataloguing our prayers would force some of us to own the fact that we just don't pray very much...at least, in an intentional, focused way.

We aren't used to asking God to act in strategic ways on the behalf of those we love and serve and congregate with, and as a result of never asking God to intervene in our world in particular, focused ways, we ourselves lose an opportunity to think deeply about our world and how we're living in it.

Our ability to think creatively about the situations we find ourselves in, to think about how our congregation might involve itself in God's work, or to simply get outside our own perspective now and then--this ability atrophies in part because we just don't think much about what we ask God and why. A catalogue of those needs we've brought up to God and have asked Him to help us with has a whole bunch of benefits for us.

If many of us resolved to do this, we would become a congregation with a good memory of God's faithful care, and be far more encouraged to pray that God would continue to care for us in specific ways. We would ask, and perhaps receive, more than we already might.

Resolving to keep a catalogue of our prayers would change us this next year, if any of us chose to do it.

Engage in Authentic Conversation:

And you know, I want for us to be a group of people who are Christian "with all of ourselves," if that makes sense: People who are Christian Democrats, Christian Republicans, Christian Vegetarians and Veterans, Christian Buckeye fans, Steelers fans, Crew fans. Christian Ohioans. People who are, really, Christian before we're anything else, and because of that commitment to embrace the New Creation life Jesus has called us into, every part of our lives--political, financial, spiritual, physical--it all is directed by what we know about God.

I want us to take seriously our commitment to "prophetic multiculturalism," and talk about things: politics, religion, sports, sins, fears--knowing that we may disagree, but it's okay, because we are siblings in Christ who are called to love one another if we're called to anything at all.

I want us to hear one another, and think about what each other has to say, and be able to give counsel and help to one another as we sort out, together, the particular things God calls each of us to and how we particularly can be faithful given what's true about us.

I wish that we could make a congregational resolution to engage in authentic conversation with one another about what it means to be each of us. It's a cliché to say that we're all different, but we are, right? And I pray that each of us this next year is going to spend time trying to figure out how to live for Jesus given the hand that we've been dealt. We need to be able to be a congregation that welcomes sharing our lives with each other, even if we're very different from one another.

But to do this, we've have to ask how we make room for it, and where our time goes, and what it means to make new friends while keeping the old.

On Goals & Resolutions:

And these “Christian Resolutions” that we could add to the ones we’ve each already made, or have been thinking about making? The hope of them is simply that, in doing them, we might be people who live up to the example set for us in Christ.

And I’d remind us that a goal is a measurable, achievable, thing. Reading 1 more minute of Scripture a week is a measurable, achievable goal. Giving $15 more away than we give now a month is a measurable, achievable goal. And achieving these kind of goals has way more importance for any one of us than, say, intending to spend an extra half an hour a week in specific prayer, but never doing it.

Good intentions--daydreams that we never follow through on, hopes we have for ourselves that we never act on--good intentions don’t pave the road to hell; they don’t do anything, really, except strip us of a sense of our own integrity.

And what we need more than anything is to believe that we’re capable of living up to who God says we are capable of it. We’re the children of God, alive with the Holy Spirit in us, and if God calls us to greater faithfulness, we can respond to that call with all the resources God has: determination and power that hold the world together. We can do all sorts of things if we depend on God’s help in doing them. And if all we can muster is that this year, we’re going to try and eat less junk-food, then, you know: okay. There’s nothing wrong with that. But it could be connected to something more.

Something More:

For some of us, pursuing the life of a new creation person may mean something more. It may mean that this year we take seriously some physical or emotional or financial or spiritual pit we have slid into, and take all the resources God gives us to climb from it.

It's a New Year. We have an opportunity--one that's totally arbitrary, and yet totally real--to embrace who we are in Christ while rejecting behaviors and beliefs that are poisonous. We can make measurable, achievable goals to act in ways that will transform us into people who are more like Jesus at the end of 2019 than we are this morning.

So if there are things about our lives that we need to leave in 2018, let's leave them behind. We've got 24 hours to shake them off. It could be just that we need to eat less junk food, but it might be something more? And if so, what is it?

What is it?

What are the addictions we don't talk with anyone about? What are the things we use to self-medicate ourselves or to escape from the responsibilities and pressures of our lives? What are the sins that feel good, but only for a fading little while, that we have let control us? What are the relationships that we know are not as good as they could be, but we have given up on healing them or fixing them? What have we given up stewarding?

If there is one certain thing about the future it's that it will require us to make choices, and that we can, if we want, choose for God instead of away from him in every choice we make. How in 2019 will we welcome Jesus into our lives more fully than we are today?

Conclusion:

We walk around as little symbols, little signs, of the New Creation future that God is going to bring about in the world. Nothing else is more important than doing this well, but we do it while we live, while we deal with jobs and family and hobbies and all the stuff our calendars and receipts reveal about us. God knows this, and wants to help us become more like Jesus right where we are. All we have to do is choose to receive the help.

And if God points out some ways we need to live differently this coming year, let's respond faithfully. At least, try--for yourself and your family, for our church and our Lord--to consider where in your life you need renewal, and what you can resolve to do about it this year, by the power and mercy of God.
